

“Michal began teaching in our religious education programs [St. Louis de Montfort Parish, Fishers, Indiana] around 1990 or so when the parish began to grow. Let me start off by saying that you would not be disappointed with her as a facilitator for biblical studies. She is, almost, excessive in her attention to details about the subject, and is extremely knowledgeable about the resources. When she lists a reference for you as resource you can be assured that she is very familiar with that resource.

Michal is an eclectic scholar. She does not buy into the idea of just taking a booklet, manual, or other program book and following that for a course. If you review her references you will see she is always into the idea of setting her goals for education and the using whatever resources she has to get there.

Michal has always been very concerned that she is orthodox in her presentations, in her thinking, and in her approach to Scripture study. By this time you can be sure I think that I would recommend Michal as an instructor. She is great. If I were to pick out anything that I have a problem with it is that she is so meticulous about details. I had the same problem in the seminary and in graduate school with professors who were so meticulous and covered all the details every time. But Michal is one of those who can spend a lot time on details and never loose sight of the goal, or orthodoxy, or the big picture she is trying to present.”
